Overview and Outlook

Taiwan

The tech sector correction has been in line with our expectations, driven by the appreciating NT dollar, slow seasonality and profit taking.

Although we remain positive on the profit growth outlook for the tech sector in 2006, we believe slow seasonality of tech sector and President Chen wanting to tighten China policy will limit market near-term upside. TAIEX will be trade between 6300-6700 and could find strong support at 6100-6200 level

China

Sentiment and liquidity continually improved in the China domestic market in January. Market speculated on future merger of A share and B share markets, with the release of the rules on foreign strategic investment in A share market. Shanghai B share moved up 39.5% and Shenzhen B shares increased by 29.2%. Shanghai A share climbed 7.43% and Shenzhen A share went up 9.41%. Foreigners were aggressive buyers.

The Hong Kong market had a strong start in January. Hang Seng Index went up 5.89%, H share rose 17.76% and Red Chips increased by 8.49%. Money poured into China concept stocks. The rally was broad based. Consumer stocks, oil and commodity players performed the strongest.

China growth will slow down moderately in 2006 and corporate earnings likely face overcapacity pressure. However, China growth story is still very strong and China stock markets become a liquidity driven markets. After 3 months rally consolidation can happen soon. We will carefully manage the market high volatility and watch out for turning points.
